
CRANO

THE ANGRY VOLCANO FROM THE ISLAND OF jìgijòlò.

A Story by Anel Annandale & Illustrated by James Mann.

Far far away on the little island of JIGIJOLO, lived a young and very unpredictable Volcano.

Named . . .

CRANO

Also on the island lived the people of the JOLO, who played and stayed below the Volcano.

There were times when CRANO'S anger would rise, to the point where his feelings could no longer hide.

This volcano would begin to shudder and shake, even the trees of the island would quake!

CRANO would fill up with so much emotion,
it could cause a very sudden, uncontrollable explosion!

The islanders would grab their boats and flee to the sea,
only to watch their village burn between the trees.

When CRANO calmed down he saw what his anger had done, everything smouldering now, all the villagers gone.

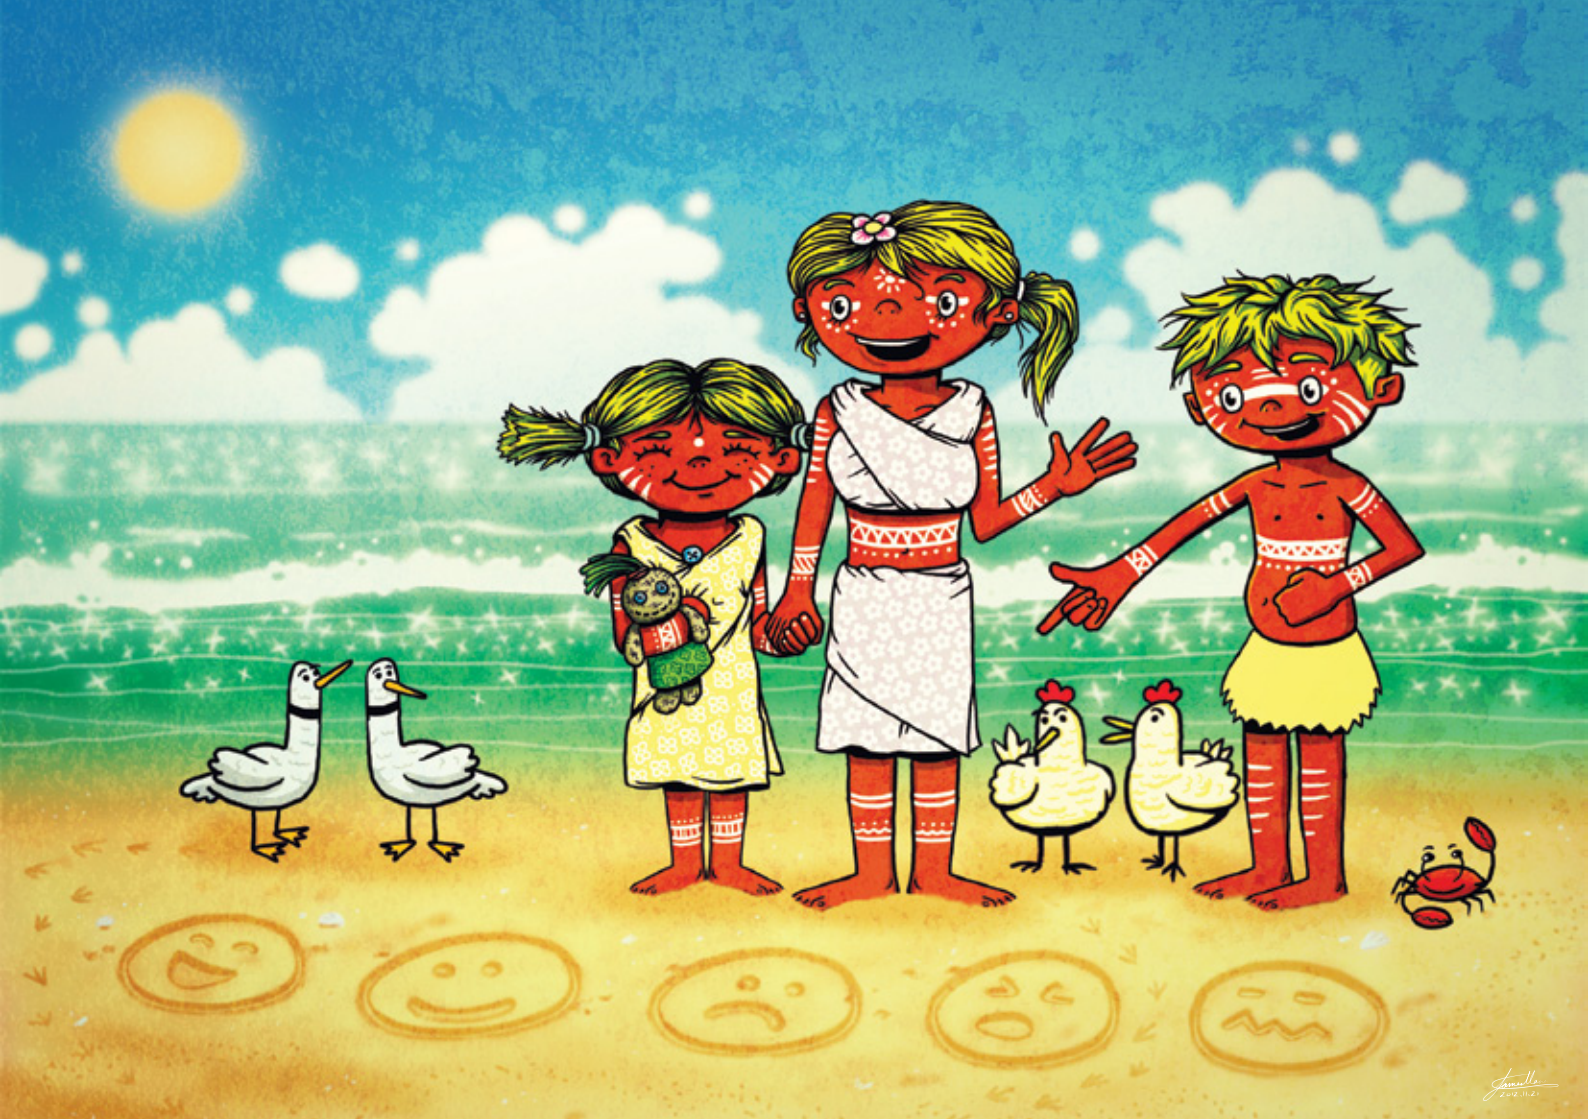

He had ruined and scarred this beautiful land and deep within himself, he felt very, very SAD.

But the villagers returned, and started anew.
They decided to teach CRANO, what to do!

“Feeling emotions is normal and great, but to take it out on others is not a good decision to make.”

“So don't allow your feelings to build, boil or rise, just letting off steam would be helpful and wise.”

From then on when CRANO got angry or just plain upset, he would just let off some steam, instead.

The villagers would celebrate when they saw the fluffy clouds rise, as it meant that before exploding, CRANO thought twice.

This made them all happy and very good friends, because CRANO never blew up again.
